Cultural citizenship. The concept of 'cultural citizenship' emerged recently to describe a form of citizenship associated with multicultural societies, comprising a cultural community that regards itself as the majority, and minority cultural communities. The term has been used to describe the right of the minority or marginalised cultural community to being different without revoking their rights of belonging to that society (Rosaldo, 1994).

Cultural citizenship in the United States rests on a seeming paradox. It involves the simultaneous claim to one's cultural difference and to the right to be a first-class citizen. Rather than accepting the dominant ideology that posits difference as a stigma or a sign of inferiority, cultural citizenship asserts that even in contexts of inequality people have a right to their distinctive heritage. The term cultural refers to specific notions that convey a sense of human worth, such as ...
